

Why should you get a Pixel?

We are going to hold off on setting our thoughts in stone since at time of writing, we still haven't received the phones yet. But still, based on the information we have so far, the Pixel 2 and the Pixel 2 XL (since the original Pixels are now discontinued) don't exactly seem like game changers in the market. Apart from stock Android and literally the best camera (by the numbers at least) you can fit onto a smartphone, the Pixels don't have much going for them. The competition is a little too fierce, with the likes of LG G6, Samsung Galaxy S8, OnePlus 5, Essential PH-1 all duking it out with the Pixel 2 and the LG V30, Samsung Galaxy S8+/ Note 8, iPhone X against the Pixel 2 XL. Each of the other devices have their own clearly defined strengths and weaknesses but most of them make compelling cases for themselves. Unless a person really REALLY wants bleeding edge versions of stock Android as soon as they become available, they'd perhaps be better off with another phone. But we still can't say, with the Pixel 2's being so new. Perhaps the whole is greater than the sum of the parts and the Pixel 2 and Pixel 2 XL might become the next Android kings, even with not so great hardware design. Only time will tell. What do you guys think? Pixel 2 – Yay or Nay? Send us your views at editor@digit.in.

Perhaps the third time's the charm. We sincerely hope that the Pixel 3 and the Pixel 3 XL finally turn out to be an actual designed by Google phone. The Pixel 2 got close but.... The market is pretty much innovate or die. Since Google has most parts of the equations down pat, all they need to do is get some good hardware to complement Android P and they should comfortably and indisputably take the crown of the Android Flagship King. d
