

Networking and Relationships

As a freelancer, your greatest asset is your relationships. Attend networking meetings, talk to people, hand out your business card and maintain relationships with business owners and other freelancers. Meetup.com is a great site to keep an eye out for such events. There are several meetups where you can interact with startups. Also, there are dedicated business networking clubs that you can check out. A point to consider- although networking clubs are a great place to meet new prospects, it's a good idea to use that avenue when you have a bigger portfolio.

Even if you don't get a client or bag a project immediately at any of these meetings, don't be disappointed. Harvest these relationships and keep in touch. Send them links, images etc. of your projects. They may not have a project now but they might have a future requirement. If nothing else, they can refer you to someone who is looking for a freelancer.

Guest posts

Projecting your work on another blog as a guest contributor will usually mean doing it for free. Apart from this one con, there are a host of benefits attached to it. A guest post means instant eyeballs and mass coverage. Your reach to potential clients widens exponentially and you get another

Working with established bloggers increases your credibility by association and exponentially widens your reach to potential clients