

feather to add in your cap. Getting credits for a work well done in front of your industry influencers increases your credibility and builds your brand.

There are blogs on every topic imaginable- from content writing to web-site designing to digital marketing. A quick Google search will point you in the right direction. Before you approach the blogger to contribute a guest post, go through their blog in detail. See their previous posts, go through the comments section. Understand it in detail, who are their audience, what is the message they usually try to send out, what are they trying to achieve, what is their niche etc. Connect with them and explain your strengths, what you can contribute, why should your post be featured on their blog and what benefits you can bring to the table. Remember there are no free lunches, so unless they see a clear benefit for them, you will not be entertained.

Pick and choose your projects

You will be sorely tempted to post all of your 20 -30 projects and show the amount of work you have done. But is that last minute rush job done in an hours time for a college assignment really going to help your portfolio? Or is that going to scare off a client? It's quality not quantity that matters. Pick your best projects in the area you want to work in and portray only those. It's not a dump it's your talent showcase. Even if you put up only 3, you can still make a snazzy portfolio that will pop eyes.

Describe your projects

One regularly occurring mistake in a portfolio that people assume that the work speaks for itself. Wait...isn't that how the saying goes? Is that what you are thinking? Time to unlearn something. Modesty is good but as a freelancer it cripples you. Talk about the work and the project you have posted. Try and build a narrative on it, take the audience behind the scenes. Get them involved in the process and show them how you work and how you overcome challenges. If you are not a writer, get help- you can hire freelance writers.

If it's a photography blog, talk about the client brief, how the set was arranged, what difficulties you faced in arranging the props etc. For a designer, you can say how you got the idea, take them through the process, the client interactions and such. Model the tone of the description depending on your field. E.g. if you are in the creative field like designing, keep the tone at a light banter, conversational, quirky and witty. You will resonate more with your audience increasing your chances of being hired.
