

This serves multiple purposes- potential clients know what to expect, you can show your dedication without being cliched and if written carefully with SEO in mind, can help with Google rankings for your page.

Build a Niche

When you start out, you want to take on any work under the sun, you don't want to limit your scope and your chances of being hired, which is understandable. Over a period of time though, you need to start defining a niche for yourself. Think about becoming a specialist in a particular area and gear your portfolio accordingly. Publish only those projects that show your speciality. It will attract better paying clients and build your brand. You can start commanding a premium for your work.

Put yourself in the shoes of an engineering startup owner. You want to create a blog and are looking for a freelance writer. You see two profiles, one is a generic writer who has written on technical topics, art, finance and many more. On the other hand you see someone who has in depth experience of writing about various scientific topics like fundamental physics, virtual reality, quantum computing etc. Which one would you prefer? The specialist right? You would trust them to understand your needs better and deliver high quality content. The generalist might have also given the same quality but you trust him for his specialised focus.
