

A well written and SEO optimised blog can help drive customers to you references to work that you have already done in the recent past, which works as indirect marketing for your services.

While setting up the blog, take the time out to add a tab to the navigation bar that reads 'portfolio' or something synonymous. Showcase your work here for potential clients to see. If they like what you have been writing about on your blog, chances are they will want to see glimpses of your previous projects. The connect between what you are 'preaching' and 'practicing' will be provided through this medium.

Do not forget to add another tab that allows clients to connect with you and hire you via your website. This page could start with a number of testimonials from happy clients that have hired you in the past. Keeping it simple and honest should do the trick. Let your work do the talking.

Blog posts

Now you have a blog that's up and running. What do you do with it? Use it to advertise yourself. When people directly sell you their products, sometimes it comes across as being very pushy. Blog posts will allow you to establish your image as an industry expert of sorts without being 'in your face'.

When you write about topics that you can link your own work to, it helps keep the post fresh and original. For instance, a freelance photographer writing about 'Wedding Photography Tips For Destination Weddings' includes tips on what to pack for wedding photoshoots on a beach while citing examples of his last beach wedding experience. This is bound to create
