

The old marketing style of meet add greet is still very much strong and useful

The joy about networking events is that it may also provide you with allies. You might meet other freelancers doing similar work. Creating bonds might mean sending spillover work each other's way or the chance of getting larger projects that could need more than one leader at the helm.

Facebook ads to the rescue

So you have been networking online through various Facebook groups, sharing links to your blog posts, helping people solve queries related to your services etc. You have also been getting out there in the real world and attending networking events that have helped you get contacts that you're hoping to convert into business.

There is another powerful tool at your disposal that requires a little investment but is absolutely worth every penny at the end of the day. Meet 'Facebook Ads'. These little babies could end up catapulting your business by a few thousands (and much more) basis how much you put in and how well you design your ad.

Facebook ads let you narrow down or widen your network basis your requirement. You can choose from a number of factors that include target age range, location, gender, age, etc. The specifics help in keeping your advertising costs low while ensuring your marketing message is reaching the right people. Run a couple of ads simultaneously with different target audience factors to see what's the right fit for you.
