

The untapped potential of Pinterest

Most freelancers usually flock to Facebook, Instagram and Twitter to share information about themselves or their goods. An oft ignored tool of advertising is Pinterest. This sharing app/website allows for you to get the attention without as much work on your end as the three leading social media giants mentioned here. A pin left has the potential to send traffic to your website months and years after it was left there.

Around 68% of the users on Pinterest are women. So if your business caters largely to women or is gender neutral, this might be the perfect place for you to sell your wares. There is a large amount of data available to prove that Pinterest generates more referral traffic to your personal websites than that of YouTube, Facebook and Google+ combined. Over 80% of the pins on Pinterest are repins. What this means for you as a seller is that chances of your infographic or images being re-posted and thus, garnering more interest is higher than on the other social media sites.

An overlooked medium, in the right hands it can be client magnet

Does that mean we are suggesting you ditch Facebook and the likes? Hell, no! We are suggesting you definitely consider adding Pinterest to the mix of things and see if the results work for you.

Freebies to grab eyeballs

While giving out free services every once in awhile would probably sound anything but enticing, do not write it off as yet. Sometimes giving people a sneak peek of what your work looks like might be the best way to rope