

them in. But how do you choose when and how to give away these freebies? Here are some ideas.

You could run a contest on your Facebook page or your blog. The contest winner could win a free goodie. For instance, if your business is creating customised t-shirts and leather jackets, you could run a contest that gets your followers/readers to share stories from their road trips.

The best story could probably win a customised t-shirt for their gang or a single leather jacket with something that connects to their story. The result? You have a happy customer who will be more than happy to do a social media shoutout for you. And as discussed earlier, word of mouth always helps.

Another really easy way of getting traffic to your social media pages or your blog is to use the services of an influencer. An influencer is someone who boasts of a strong online presence. This person has a list of followers longer than the entire length of the River Nile. Their followers trust them and their recommendations. By providing your goods for free to such an influencer and getting a deal from them to talk about your services, you might be able to convert a few (or hopefully, a lot) of their fans.

Share your know-how

While sharing your knowledge for free may sound counterintuitive to what you set out to do, it might be a fabulous way of getting new work. When you talk about your knowledge in your chosen industry, and help people

No matter how experienced you are, there is always room to grow and listening to client feedback is the best way to go about it