

As the primary objective of working, be extremely clear on the fees and payment terms

If you are a marketing consultant, you can insert a clause saying, “The consultancy fees amounting to xxxx amount are to paid on the 30th of every month. These fees are inclusive of GST @ 18%.”. Sometimes, for a certain project, there may be a bonus involved upon hitting a certain target or completing well before the deadline.

You can also include certain clauses to your rates and the conditions in which they can be revised (upwards of course). E.g. you are a freelance writer hired to create website content and ghostwrite a blog for the same client. If the blog is extremely technical and requires a lot of research on your end, you can specify different rates per word for the website content and for the blog.

Deadlines

Take a look at this example- “The project will be submitted on 30 November 2017”. A one line clause that leaves a lot of ambiguity and does not account for several factors. Include more details and address various scenarios. Deadlines can be staggered or could be one final date to submit the entire work. You can break it into milestones if needed. Specify from when the deadline is to be calculated or is it a specific date (although this is usually not a good idea).

Mention if it's predicated on you requiring any information from the client to work. The deadline can be calculated from the date the data is received.
