

credits given should be outlined. You can specify that the company should give credits to you for its creation. Same is the case for website designing.

Another point you should include is the usage rights and ownership of rejected designs. Who owns those designs? If you don't own them and have to hand them over to the client, you should factor in their costs too in your charges.

In your line of work, you may receive images from the client that you need to use. How do you know if there is copyright infringement issue connected with these images? Mention that you are not liable for any copyright issues for images sent by the client nor for researching on the ownership of such images and work. Put the responsibility solely on the client. On the other hand, you may also need to search for images yourself for a client. Understand whether the client is willing to purchase these images or will use free "available for reuse" images.

Like we said, copyright is a veritable minefield and you can consider consulting a lawyer about this particular clause. Of course it goes without saying that all of these points need to be discussed with the client in depth before drawing up the contract.

Legal jurisdiction

Even after drawing up a stringent contract, a client can still renege. Your last hope is a legal recourse (shudder at the thought). But you need to be prepared for this unfortunate possibility too. In this case, you need to specify a legal jurisdiction for the case and arbitration. This is even more important if you and the client are based in different cities. Specifying your jurisdiction will save you trips, time and reduce your expenses if it comes to a court case. Lookup sample contracts on how this particular clause is worded to get it right.

Confidentiality clause

In certain aspects of your work, you may be privy to insider information regarding to strategies. This is usually the case if you are working as a strategic or marketing consultant or sometimes even as a content writer. Including a confidentiality clause that protects client data will be highly appreciated.

Confidentiality is a two way street. This clause should also ensure that the client keeps certain information about you confidential especially your charges. Your fees may vary from client to client and will definitely change
