

There are certain basic software and services which a freelancer would have to purchase or subscribe to. The following are a few examples:

Skype for Business:

As a freelancer, you will conduct a lot of your business via online communication. Especially, when taking briefs, negotiating or having meeting with people across distances, a professional medium of communication is necessary. Paid services like Skype for business, which enable video conferences and screen sharing will come in handy. You can keep your professional communication formal, streamlined and organised.

Dropbox for Business:

In order to store and access your data at any point of time and on any device, storage platforms like Dropbox with its paid plans offer 2TB of storage get you access to your work on the go.

Dropbox makes storing your essential data convenient.

Freelancer subscription:

Services like Freelancer, which connect clients from all over the world with freelancers, will require you to pay so that your offerings can gain traction and attraction.

Every freelancer must factor in such investments as a rudimentary underwriting for his or her business. But, investment here isn't a one-time instalment. It is gradual. Similar to any company, a freelancer too needs to constantly invest in his business.

However, unlike any other business organisation, a freelancer is his own product. He or she is his own brand and CEO. He or she is a person in charge with an innate talent to offer to the world. Along with skill development and tools, it is also important to invest in faith, hard work and commitment. For a freelancer, every investment they make goes into themselves. So, budding freelancer, invest in yourself! d

Note: This chapter was contributed by Shweta Khanolkar from Techved