

cessful, the exercise is worth it. If you are unsuccessful more often than not, adjust your techniques and try again. If all else fails, you can always request help from a seasoned hunter. Even if no one is willing to hunt with you, there will always be someone who's plump enough to sit around disseminating and feeding their ego in place of their stomach. Focus on experience and quantity.

Third step - more practice. What seemed daunting at first will now seem familiar. But if you are an intelligent hunter, you know the practice never ends. It only becomes more specific, precise and refined. This is where the hunting metaphor defies itself - as you get better at hunting, more types of prey will flock to you. If you are good and persistent enough to get to this point, remember to stay lean, and keep trimming your diet as you discover your particular tastes. Shift from quantity to quality.

Finding clients online

Literally speaking, you have the highest chances of hunting prey that wants to be hunted. Look up professional platforms (like ProBlogger, Freelancer.com, Elance, Upwork, Fiverr, etc) join various 'media jobs' groups on Facebook, and apply to as many gigs as you can. When you're starting out, rejections and successes are equal (although they don't feel the same,) so don't forget to remind yourself of that fact. All the while keep in mind the principles of the opening chapters and you'll be well on your way.
