

- If you are in love with a product (and there are many products to fall in love with in this hyper-consumerist age) and you would like to take that amazing product to as many people as you could, this is for you.
- Some people don't like to be confined by a time-table that a day job entails. If that sounds like you, direct sales gives you a flexible mode of work in which you could function at a time of your own choosing.

Some people are just made for direct sales!

- If you like to challenge yourself to make as much money as possible, , you should consider this. Theoretically, there is no set upper limit for the money you could make with direct sales.

If you have read this far and are still going on, we assume that you are interested in direct sales, notwithstanding its challenges. Here, then, are things that should be on your checklist:

Choose a product you are passionate about

There are two things: 1) You couldn't be a great salesperson unless you are passionate about the product you are selling. 2) As mentioned earlier, direct sales demands you to be patient, and unless you are passionate about the product, chances are low that you would be able to sustain the business for a long term. So, it makes sense to choose a product to sell that you are passionate about.