

artists, you would be getting commission based upon how much your recruitments sell. Also, in these cases, even if you don't recruit others, if you make enough sales, you could still be earning well.

Getting enough leads to begin

Before you could sell a single product, you should develop as many leads as possible. Here's how you can do that:

- List the names of at least 50 people you know whom you think would be interested in the product you wish to sell. Chances are high that just a part of this number would actually buy something from you.
- Make a business card for yourself and hand them to shops and businesses in your locality, informing them about the product .
- Meet at least a few new people every day. Meeting in person has an impact that cannot be replicated online.
- Ask your friends and relatives to share the product catalogues with their acquaintances or coworkers.
- Leave a few brochures at a local community centre like a library or sports club – after getting the permission from those concerned.
- Offer special incentives for those who would refer your product to someone who also buys it.

Leads- go get 'em!

No matter what strategy you use, the objective should be to get as many good leads as possible – for the more the number of leads, the higher the potential number of customers who would end up buying from you.

How to market yourself?

Granted that the products that you are selling are of another company's. But investing (a little) in some additional advertising from your end could take you a long way.

You could try to reach out to as many relevant people as possible by using social media and/or other media including local news media like the
