

regional cable operator if that's feasible. You could also plan small-scale events to promote the products.

You could also consider direct selling parties. Such parties are a great way to attract potential customers to a single space – it could be your own home. It would be a great avenue for the potential customers to experience the products first-hand, as well as find out about upcoming sales and products.

Market yourself, sell the product!

The art of networking

Networking is arguably the single-most important thing that you would need to do to build a good business in the direct selling game. To this end, you should always make sure to have people who actually respect the work that you are doing and who would support you in your endeavour.

There is also no harm in reaching out to other consultants in the area who sell the same products as you to get advice from them. You could also consider developing partnerships with them that could benefit both of you.

In fact, there might already be meetings that happen regularly among the regional consultants. If that's the case, you should definitely attend these meetings since they could be great source of learning. The veteran consultants may share valuable marketing/sales tips with others. Also, to entrench yourself in circles of people who share the same ideals and objectives as you is a great way to keep yourself motivated. There is, of course the additional – and more obvious – advantage of the possibility of establishing partnerships that could benefit you.

To say that direct sales is for everyone would be an obvious lie. The same could be said about the idea that it doesn't have any challenges. Indeed,