

ment? Bring on the existential crises, the wistful dreams of being a poet or a filmmaker, the crudely chalked out MBA plans, and the cursing of a system that swallows one up as a young caterpillar, rips the chrysalis off and dumps one onto the production line with an ignominy not even inflicted in British chicken farms. Phrases like ‘rat race’ and ‘this country is going to the dogs’ and ‘I wish I hadn’t drank so much in college, I don’t remember a thing’ tend to be thrown around.

Pleasantly, it turns out that you can turn your empty cup right back into the gushing flow of students that you were once part of, and actually turn a profit as a tutor. With the pressure to succeed having been adopted by every generation these days, including the great-grandmothers who ‘must see an MBA in the family to find peace after death’ - this is a tutor’s market, and a young student’s hell. As a tutor, you can turn the tables quite suddenly, and if you’re sadistic (please don’t be), you can get paid to ruin the lives of countless young minds, fuelling the cycle. Guess the rat race is coming out handy, eh?

Before we get into the thick of it, an important disclaimer - noble principles are expensive. Like any economy, the tutoring market works on demand and supply. If you have skills that a lot of students are trying to learn (read: engineering), you’re going to have a lot of business. If you majored in Contemporary Cubism however, you’re going to have a tougher time. That said, if you still want some extra cash, you can always stow your beloved passion-subject away for a while and tutor schoolkids. Low-budget excellence is always in demand.

Let’s be analytical, treat this like a case study that might even help your MBA prep, and think about the real audience here. Who needs tutoring? What topics are most in demand? What kind of tutoring? What’s the product here? What are you trying to sell? And we can’t forget the big question, how long will it take for you to be able to afford a Ferrari?

Who needs tutoring?

Well, most people under the age of 21, and a surprising number over. How
