

occasion, journalism or film, tend to be primarily in demand. Beyond that, concepts in finance, computer science, and even history and art, may find occasional interest from people who want to further their careers or enhance their appreciation of culture. The latter, of course, are often ex-rat-racers who finally have enough money to look around and think about what they might have missed.

What kind of tutoring?

1. Online tutoring

The combined wonders that are video-chatting and screen-sharing make it possible to tutor online, and on a freelance basis. This can be an absolute blessing for people with full-time jobs, or unpredictable schedules. Websites like the American chegg.com, the Indian toppr.com and equivalents have found a huge market to tap into. These sites usually offer an online 'lesson', which involves you, the tutor, solving a problem, or explaining a concept, sometimes even just via text. Check them out, make an account, and get in on the action before it gets saturated.

2. Live tutoring

Kids in your neighbourhood are guaranteed to not be receiving the kind of academic attention they deserve. Go over the curriculum (often available online these days), talk to the parents, and set up a trial lesson. Your personal equation with the kid and unique take on the subject he's struggling with might just be right what the doctor ordered. Don't forget the paranoia and obsession that seems to plague the parents of the rat-race generation. You may have to withstand the trial-by-fire of the child's first examination.

3. Workshops or exposure sessions

Have a unique skill that's not exactly 'in the syllabus'? Maybe you're a whiz photographer, or study black holes, or medieval European history? Organize a workshop that introduces a wisely chosen demographic to your field. Don't be afraid to get creative. For instance, there is surprising demand for smartphone/email tutorials for senior citizens. See a need, fill a need. Teaching isn't always academic.

4. Creating solution sets

Besides the conventional options, a lot of well-established coaching institutes offer payment for that tier of work between teaching and administrative
