

needs to spread the word about its entrance. Traditional methods of advertising may get them the eyeballs, but it surely won't get them the trust that is associated with established brands that have been around for decades. How then can a relatively newer brand earn instant trust of potential customers? They can get a YouTube influencer to talk about their brand.

Say they choose a popular dance fitness trainer who has a fan-base of over 50,000 subscribers. They get her to sport their apparel while she does a contest based fitness regime that encourages users to send in their videos as well. The catch? They should be wearing something from the new apparel brand. The prize? More apparel from the same brand, but this time for free!

Bhuvan Bam's BB Ki Vines is a highly popular channel with nearly 50 lakh subscribers making him an online and offline celebrity

Sponsored or branded content isn't a new concept. For years, traditional marketing methods have involved getting celebrities on board to help their public image sell goods and services for the advertisers. The difference with using YouTube influencers is that the goods and services being sold become believable. YouTubers spend hours and sometimes years gaining the trust of their audiences. So when they sell a product to users, users are more likely to believe them.

Merchandising:

AIB (All India Bakchod) by Tanmay Bhatt is one of the most popular YouTube channels when it comes to original comedy content coming out of