

Licensing content to media:

It's not uncommon to hear of accidental success from a video on YouTube going viral. YouTubers have made millions off such incidents. Sometimes the most mundane of things become viral because viewers see something that you managed to miss as a creator. Take for instance the video of a bunch of college girls dancing to a Malayalam song called 'Jimmiki Kammal'. Little did they know that their video would cross 1.5 million views and make them famous in Hollywood. Luckily for them, the name of the track sounds similar to Jimmy Kimmel, a famous talk show host. When Kimmel was asked if he liked the song, to everyone's surprise he said he loved it. He was positively amused by the connect. The video on YouTube gained celebrity status overnight.

Once you have hit a certain popularity quotient, established brands will be chasing you for advertising and brand endorsements

When this happens, you as a creator, might be approached by television channels, news channels and other mediums of media for permission to use your content. You can charge them to use content created and curated by you.

Sometimes YouTubers manage to successfully make a video viral, either by choosing content that manages to grab eyeballs or by marketing it effectively. The licensing fee on this content is a great way of earning those extra bucks.

How to get started:

So now you've done your research on how to make money from having your own channel and you're sure that you want to become a YouTuber.
