

Don't be shy, toot your own channel across social media platforms

- the kind that could build up curiosity and ensure that your viewer does come back to see the main video. To effectively sustain your channel in the months and years to come, you have to provide engaging content.

Create playlists:

So you have created the first few videos and you have even managed to get a few views. Fantastic! But you have miles to go before you sleep. Now is a good time to create a playlist. Even if you have just 5 videos on your channel, try to put them into a playlist. The autoplay feature on YouTube encourages users to engage with more than just one video from your channel. Creating a playlist would also mean you give the audience a chance to view your content together in one place; thus getting more eyeballs for similar sort of content and creating an immersive storytelling environment.

Check data analytics:

So now your videos are getting traffic. People are visiting your channel. Things are finally coming together. This isn't the time to get complacent. Do not forget to check on the data analytics provided by YouTube. Their analysis will show you how users are engaging with your content. Are people watching the whole of your video or do they shift to another video midway? Figure out what your audience needs and cater to them- do they need a shorter video, does it have to be more impressive in terms of quality?

You can use this information to create videos that will be relevant and more likely to create a loyal audience base.

Get people talking:

While you have been consistently creating good content on YouTube and sharing it across other social media platforms, nothing is going to be better publicity for you and your channel than getting shares from your audience. Every time a user engages with your content, it is likely to get shared on
