

quick easy bucks, this is not the venture for you. Making money off surveys is easy in the exact same way that making money off typing is. Sure, you can do it easily, without a second thought, when you want to. But as a full-time job? Not so rad. On the plus side, this is the one occupation that will never, ever, replace you with a robot.

How exactly do I make money off surveys?

Companies love you... -r money. And to convince you to part with it, they often need to understand you a little better. Information about customers is incredibly valuable to a company. Think about it - if you had data for 10,000 people on demographics (how old they are, where they live, how much they earn), personality (what they like, how often they shop, how lazy they are) and environment (how advertising reaches them, where they hang out or shop) - you could probably plan a pretty cool marketing campaign, product launch, or corporate strategy. Especially compared with the scenario where you don't have any of this information.

So companies will pay you to answer questions. Don't fret, this comes right out of their advertising budget. There are tonnes of websites merely a Google search away that will offer you Paytm cash, Amazon gift vouchers, or sometimes, even PayPal transfers just for answering questions, trying out test products, testing offers and doing reviews.

Wait, so somebody will pay me just for having opinions?

Yeah, we know what you're thinking. "Wow, so I can just sit at home and enter nonsense opinions on anything under the sun and rake in the dough." Not quite.

Sure, these companies could once be fooled by nonsense answers that you could fill in without even really reading the questions - but they're no longer that gullible. Most corporate research studies are now implemented via third party sites like opinionworld.in, panelplace.com and triaba.in - and these sites design their questionnaires with surprise questions to test that you're awake, aware, and answering truthfully.

The ways they do this range from asking you to reverify past information (enter your date of birth on page 1, then your age on page 9), or asking you simple questions (how many sides does a square have), or even asking you the same question you answered a while ago to verify that you answer the same thing. Honestly, this can be pretty tiresome.

Worse, if you don't pass these tests, you might be booted out of the survey mid-way even after having spent 15 minutes of your life on it. So remember
