

Working solo might be the new norm for you

When the payments do roll in continuously, or when you have multiple clients and they are all paying up in time, you experience a ‘feast’ period.

A smart thing to do is to save up when you are in ‘feast’ mode and hopefully you won’t end up feeling like a pauper when the famine hits.

Lonely.... I’m Mr. Lonely!

Were you one of those popular kids in high school - the kind who was constantly surrounded by friends and teammates from the football team or drama club or whatever else made you popular among the jocks or the nerds? Freelancing may not be the greatest idea for someone who is a ‘people person’. Given that most of your time will be spent alone at home completing contractual work or projects provided by clients that you interact with primarily via emails, phone calls or maybe video calls, your interaction with humans outside the house might be at a minimum. Adapting to such a change for a people person can be a bit daunting.

One way to combat this feeling is to work out of communal work spaces that are springing up across most major cities nowadays. They provide you with basic amenities you need like WiFi connection, coffee machine, stationery, a desk etc. Such spaces also help you interact with other freelancers. If you get your game face on, you might be able to network your way into new ‘gigs’ by collaborating with your fellow freelancers.