

Don't fall into the trap of taking on so much work that you miss deadlines.
Nothing can ruin your reputation faster.

pattern that you get stuck in, your credibility can be ruined overnight. No one wants to hire a freelancer who can't get the job done! Period.

It's okay to start slow. Take on only the amount of work you know can be done in the timeline expected of you. You need to deliver consistently so that clients start referring you and/or consider calling you back for their future projects.

Are you home today?

Remember that one day, back when you had that office job and you got permission to 'work from home'? Truthfully, how much work did you get done?

Staying at home comes with its own set of distractions. If you live with parents, a spouse or children, you could have issues setting boundaries. If your roommate or whoever you are sharing your living space with, see you as 'being at home', they are likely to give you tasks or request favors that wouldn't have been mentioned if you were in the office.

When you have other people in the house at the same time as your working hours as a freelancer, ground rules will have to be established. You can consider converting one of the bedrooms into a work station of sorts.
