

be stress inducing to cope with. Especially during periods of quiescence in the business. Whereas, a warehouse in a remote location outside the city limits would cover these costs rather quickly.

From point A to point B and in record time

Presenting Mr. & Mrs. Brown-trousers-UPS-man to your Postman chacha

Now that your warehouse is all set up and functional, it is time to set up a goods delivery mechanism. A home run stockist of goods ideally would have to invest in a tie up with a local shipping or courier service to maximise and optimise the fact that they are open to wider range of audience (cross country/global). This means, an excellent delivery system will have to be implemented to keep levels of customer satisfaction high and to use to its full potential the dense number of buyers. Remember the time you ordered that last minute birthday present for your wife? It was delivered three days later than they said they would. You not only worked from your couch, but also slept on it for over a week. You don't want them to go through the same hassle now, do you? The crux of this model completely depends in meeting the fast delivery turnaround time expected by the masses today.

Knock Knock. No seriously, not a joke, it's your order from last night's drunken internet buys

A store set up does not cater to the large number of potential clients like your average "couch surfers" would. Most of their clientele would be from a smaller geographical radius.
