

to buy them from you. This is not a problem faced by those selling mass products since in that case, the hard part of promoting the products would be done by the big brands in the category.

Online subscriptions

To make the customer's life easy, companies – especially startups – offer subscriptions with an interesting mix of services and products.

And more and more customers are beginning to buy subscriptions in India. While the fact remains that compared to more developed markets, India is not yet a huge subscriptions market, but with internet penetration deepening in the country and more people buying things online, subscription sales should also shoot up. Indeed, it's even considered by many as the next big online business in India.

At present, some of the categories for which subscription models are in demand in India include music, software, videos, training lectures, online certification courses, e-books, magazines and newspapers.

Handmade products

There's no doubt that the current age is an age of mass products.

From phones to clothing and everything in between, the rush is to get the latest trend in your hands – a trend that became so only because a large number of people took a liking to it.

By definition, handmade products are not meant for mass consumption, because of the simple fact that they can't be produced fast. But that's not to say that handmade products don't have takers.

The nature of mass consumption has made it harder for anyone to stand out in the crowd. And that's where handmade products find their market. The fact that India has a great tradition of handicrafts and the presence of artisans makes it even more viable an option.

Handcrafted ornaments and footwear are especially in demand over here.

Now that you have a fair idea about the kind of products that work in the Indian market, we hope that you are one step closer to taking the right decision on which product you should bring to the consumers. d