

competitive environment. As a seller, you should be willing to address the concerns of your customers without delay. In this chapter, we will examine the various policies adopted by various e-commerce providers when it comes to after sales services including tips to grow your business.

Direct selling

If you are selling directly via your own website, you should have a proper customer service team in place. In addition to traditional email and telephone support, you can also integrate a live chat service. Your buyer will be able to contact you at anytime directly by initiating the live chat service. Moreover, mobile-based messaging platforms such as WhatsApp and Telegram can also be used to interact with customers. If you provide your WhatsApp number on the official website, it will serve as an added attraction for customers. Moreover, they will know that the seller virtually exists. If a customer contacts you after delivering the item, you can provide the contact details of the relevant service centre. If you are selling locally within the city limits, then you should have a proper home delivery mechanism in place. Your customers will purchase products by visiting your shop and you can deliver them personally without using any third-party courier providers. It is advisable to add several Frequently Asked Questions (FAQs) on the website, which will help buyers to a large extent.

Going the e-commerce way

Our Government is promoting technology and e-commerce on a large scale. It requires time, skills and patience to build a comprehensive front-end and back-end system. If the customer and after-sales services are bad, you will lose customers. We will examine how the popular e-commerce providers have implemented the customer service mechanism in detail.

Flipkart

The concept of the real customer serviced changed dramatically with the evolution of Flipkart in 2017. The company created a robust system by providing both before and after sales service via a dedicated toll-free number and email. Normally, buyers would either dial a toll-free number or email the queries by navigating to the contact us page. If you are a seller, you would view a dedicated dashboard which provided order related information. Flipkart provides a facility for the customers to cancel their order any time before it is delivered. In case a customer cancels the order, you can contact
