

However, finding prospective customers is difficult in the competitive world. A product will be on sale for several prices and customers will not only opt for low prices but also those sellers with positive ratings and five-star reviews. Sellers should strive hard to provide excellent support and also request buyers to leave reviews by creating personalised emails and by maintaining constant contact with them. The online marketplaces are now flooded with a huge number of sellers and only the best will be able to survive in the long run. Your responsibility doesn't end with delivering the product but in prompt after-sales service as well. We have examined how you can retain customers, something that is critical for the success of your business. With the rapid growth of social media, sellers should tap into the vast opportunities available on the platform such as boosting their products via Facebook or Instagram. Going forward, things will only get tougher for sellers without an active presence on social media. The basic mantra for great after-sales service is accessibility, responsiveness, punctuality and an active engagement with buyers. If you follow these, you will not only be able to retain customers, but attract new ones to your online shop. Happy selling.
