

But, not all trademarks and logos are cryptic. For example, Volkswagen's trademark distinctly identifies its German provenance and its main use (Volkswagen – German for people's car). This is a good example of beauty in simplicity.

What is a trademark?

Well, a lot, at least in this century

A trademark to a business is what a tattoo is to you. It's nearly permanent and represents who you are or what your business does. A trademark, also known as service marks, is the identity and the name of your brand. It is a means of communicating this to the world by a logo, image, abbreviation or a bespoke design of sorts. Call it whatever you please, trademark, trade mark or trade-mark, it's the identity of your business now. Trademarks are often used to help the consumer relate an image with your product or service. These will be used by your organisation on company communication stationery, letterheads, vouchers, email signatures, visiting cards, etc. It will be glorified, illuminated and erected on the office buildings. This corporate identity makes everything seem more official and serious. Surely you would agree?
