

The image says it all – the simple almost innocuous looking symbol next to a logo grants it invisible Kevlar[®] armour supporting documents and the requisite fee to the registrar of copyrights. Remember, separate applications should be made for registration of each work – in case you have multiple products and wish to copyright the identity of each product. After a 30 day waiting period to receive objections, if any, to your logo the examiner will scrutinise your logo for any discrepancy in accordance with the law. If no discrepancy is found, the registration is approved and the copyright certificate is issued. Typically, this process takes around 45-60 days to complete, if there are no objections or discrepancies found.

In case there is an objection, the Registrar will hear from both the sides – you and the objector – and provide his/her ruling. If the application is rejected, you will need to make a fresh application with a different design. If the matter is resolved, it will go to the examiner. Discrepancy found by the examiner can also be a reason for rejection. In this case, a letter will be issued to the applicant and again there will be a hearing with the Registrar. If the Registrar finds in your favour, you get the certificate; if not, again start from the top. Pretty simple.

Suddenly picking a username for an email account doesn't seem so bad does it? 