

of them offer a wide-range of products and then there are some that specialise in particular product types like printrove.in, offering only customised designs. Websites like Shopify.in help you to create your e-commerce portal with synced orders and vendor inventories to ease your business. Apart from that, most of the drop shipping websites offer to build an e-commerce portal with all the features for you for a price. It is worth your time to do a detailed analysis and research on these sites to find the right fit for you.

Right products

Remember the cut-throat competition we had talked about earlier? In a world of me too's, how do you stay ahead of the competition? Not everybody can be an Elon Musk or Steve Jobs launching awesome, mind boggling designs and selling them with enviable panache. But what anyone can do is find a niche. A product that addresses a particular need of a segment or class of consumers and you become the epitome of that product. You are so widely known and so highly regarded for that particular product that you have built up a tremendous following and brand loyalty amongst your customers. You can charge a premium for your brand and remain one step ahead of the competition.

Achieving this is not an easy task and requires an intense amount of patience, research, data mining and a fair share of logic to connect all the dots. You can start by asking for online surveys, talking to potential customers in person, profiling your customers and putting yourself in their shoes.

Any business is only as good as you can manage it. Drop shipping does take out the sting out of the inventory management and helps you build a leaner e-commerce model but it's not without its pitfalls. All said and done, it is definitely an easier route to the e-commerce business and you can scale it up as you go. d
