

If you can provide free shipping on all products, you will become God or go bankrupt soon with the added costs. Can you find a middle ground?

any delivery charges on the products but somebody has to. If you, the store owner, do pay then that will lower your margins further. So maybe if you charge actuals, that should do the trick. So what do we need to set that up? An instantaneous feedback from the delivery company you have tied up with and the necessary software to maintain that sync. What if the system fails or if there's a glitch? Then there's the third and most popular option – flat delivery charges. No matter what the customer orders no matter the size, there's a flat charge. Some will be overcharged and some undercharged but on an average, it should balance out. Hopefully. The rate can be decided on the basis of your product, packaging and average cost. You can also add in an option of free shipping over a certain order value. You can afford to take a hit on the profits there because the amount is higher.

Packaging - The Secret Weapon in Branding and Marketing

Every order you ship, every package you deliver is a chance for you to increase brand recall. You can try to stand out in the crowd by making a statement with your packaging. Rather a run of the mill box or black and white plastic wrapping, you can speak to your audience and reiterate your message. The packaging can be tailored to the product and customer profile. An innovative packaging style will of course be talked about or rather “shared” in the today's socially active world generating word of mouth advertising for you for free.

Size Does Matter

Like they say, good things come in small packages- smaller the size of the package, lower the costs and better are the margins. Courier companies charge on the basis of weight and size of the box. Why not get rid of the box? Put on our creative hat when designing your package. Experiment and test various packaging materials and options and see what fits for your product.

Once you have figured out these issues, you can move to the next phase.
