

Growth is good

When your business is small, you have a lot of time on hand. You could spend time physically checking your inventory (because there is probably not much of it to begin with), pack the boxes for delivery yourself, even supervise the whole process of dispatching deliveries. But things will change once your business starts growing.

A growing business could be both a curse and a boon. After a point in time, your bedroom will run out of space to house your wares. While your business is primarily still running with you sitting at home in your pyjamas, looking at warehousing options for your online business might be the need of the hour. This is anything but bad. This means your business is doing well. Maybe it's even booming. Looking at warehouse options may seem like a daunting task for most small businesses. But fear not, we are here to help simplify the task for you.

Do I need a warehouse?

It goes without saying that different businesses work differently. Your business might choose to invest in a warehouse due to a number of reasons. Perhaps you want to increase the number of goods that you are shipping out on a monthly basis or perhaps you want to increase the radius of your shipping fulfilment. Whatever the reason, a warehouse usually means your home business is growing beyond its current boundaries. And that is always a good reason to break out the bubbly.

As your business grows, gone are the days of micro management of hawk eyed supervision, you will need to delegate most of the work

Location, location, location

Your choice could be based on either your objective or your budget. If you are a smaller manufacturer who needs raw materials, it might make sense to have your warehouse close to your raw material provider. This would mean finished goods in a shorter time frame. Another deciding factor here would be the kind of product you are dealing with. If your goods fall under the 'perishable' category or are 'fragile' and need special handling, reducing the travel time from the warehouse to the doorstep of your customer will
