

be a good idea. So it will be imperative to find a warehouse close to both the manufacturing unit as well as your marketplace. Spend time in deciding a location as it's not something as easy as changing a shirt. Getting a warehouse means a long term commitment and you do not want to go through the entire procedure repeatedly.

Third-party logistics or fulfilment warehouses:

If your business has reached a stage where you have a little (okay, probably you'll need a decent amount) of cash to spare, then third party logistics could be the answer to your storage- space prayers. Should you choose to outsource your warehousing as well as fulfilment needs, your business could see positive impacts that you possibly did not initially associate with the move. Let's have a look.

Leasy Peasy:

Long time leases are one of the aspects of warehousing that are known to scare the living daylights out of most small business owners. Third-party warehousing takes care of just that. The flexibility that comes with monthly payments and 'as per use' kind of payments would mean that owners only pay for the amount of space that their goods are occupying in the warehouse. This is especially useful during those economic 'downtimes', a.k.a. non-peak seasons.

Savings in the piggy-bank:

Third-party logistics works on the idea that shipping costs are lowered for the company due to combined shipping volumes. They can afford it because they have multiple clients. While storing your own wares and packing your own products could be absolutely free or come at an extremely low cost, you could try and leverage the staff and expertise of the logistics company to help you get a better deal for your company and your customers. Better packaging, lesser delays in shipments, more accurate

If you can save money and get rid of the management hassles, it sounds like a dream come true right?
