

To buy or not to buy is the question

last page they were browsing. Additionally, try and give them the option to change quantities and even sizing of the goods right from their shopping cart. These may work as deterrents on those abandonment rates.

Promise What You Can Deliver:

Literally. If a customer does not receive a package within a reasonable time, it is as good as saying that the delivery never happened. Well, that's the law of the online jungle. Customers want quick service. Before you promise, ensure that you and your distribution service staff have the bandwidth to deliver. Focus on investing in quality packaging that will get the products out to the customer in one piece and safely.

A common mistake that new entrepreneurs make is trying to use lower product costs with higher delivery charges as a bait for potential customers. While it might work initially, it is a sure shot way of ruining customer relationships in the long run. Try avoiding that route altogether. Another factor that you need to consider is your confirmation emails or text messages. Customers like knowing that their order has been confirmed and they also expect a means to track the status of their order. Have an automated mailer system built in that sends confirmation emails once an order has been placed. You could include the link to the order tracking right in this email. Kill two birds with one stone we say, eh!

Most importantly, since an online store does not provide the customer with the chance to see, feel, touch or try your product, a lot of their shopping is being done in good faith. They trust your description and the images on
