

have to do is create interesting content for them to engage with, and this will help you spread the word about your home business. If you play your cards right, you might even be able to sell via social media directly. Goodbye website costs. So this is an avenue that you might want to experiment with before booking that domain name. You can even validate your product through social media before incurring the costs of building up an ecommerce website.

While the more obvious mediums of Facebook and Twitter jump to your mind when you think social media, do not underestimate the power of a site like LinkedIn. It could be a game-changer as far as advertising your product and yourself is concerned.

Social media websites like Facebook, Twitter, Instagram, LinkedIn etc. already millions of users and you just to identify your potential customers and market to them directly

Blogging it out:

Most new business owners underestimate the power of good ole blogging. A well-written and aptly-managed blog could be one of your best advertising tools. The key to a good blog is to ensure that you are creating content that not only draws readers to it, but also encourages them to interact with you. While a traditional advertisement in print media might get you the eyeballs, it's very in-the-face. People do not trust you because they do not know you. A blog, on the other hand, can do just that. It can help break the ice and get you the credibility that your business needs for your products to start flying out of the door.

Sell your USP:

USP or your unique selling point is as important to your business as your brand name is. Duh! It's what helps you stand out from the competition. Let's look at an example here to help you understand better. Remember the book 'The Secret'? Reading the book alone takes you on a journey that makes you believe that you have been part of a conspiracy where the brightest minds of the world have conspired against you getting what you wanted. If only you had known earlier, you would have sat around on your couch wishing and sending thoughts out into the cosmos about landing the lead role in
