Those who can do, also teach:

Teaching may not seem like the most direct sources of advertising, but there is so much it can do for your business and your reputation. We have said this and we will say this again. Why should your customer trust you - a new business run out of someone's home, with little or no capital investment and perhaps zero experience as an entrepreneur? Zero experience as a business owner does not translate to zero experience as an industry member. You have probably chosen to run a business based on your previous experience working in the industry or have some knowledge thereof based on your academia. Showcase this by teaching. You could choose to teach at community colleges or local activity hubs. Regardless of where you choose to teach, your students will be your walking-talking source of advertisements. Don't have the time to commit? Conduct webinar or schedule a Google Hangout. The more people start associating your name and face with the industry, the more likely they are to want to try your product because they now TRUST you. And that, ladies and gentlemen, is a big win for you and your home business.

Branding beyond the store:

Your store, as a online seller, is your website. But that does not mean that you have to stop your branding there. There are so many ways to indulge in brand extensions beyond it. Employee uniforms, for instance, are a brilliant way of establishing brand connect. If you have staff that goes on delivery rounds for you, you could get them uniforms that have your brand's logo printed on them. Seeing the brand name and logo proudly displayed on their garments makes them instant representatives of your business. If a customer is happy with the service and the overall demeanour of the delivery staff, he/she will instantly associate it with your brand.

Giveaways are another excellent tool of advertising. So if your home business is selling books, you could print bookmarks that have your brand name and are free giveaways for the customer. Or a small tote bag for them to carry the books around in, with your logo and name printed on it. Research proves that the more you see a brand name and logo, even if you do not like the advertising, you will probably recall the product more often. And this subconsciously leads to an increase in sales. Alternatively, if you are in the business of say making cold brewed coffees, you could send a free sample of
