

your newest product along with every order that crosses a predetermined amount. This tends to draw in loyal customers in the long run.

Packaging That Speaks Volumes:

Have you ever seen the box for a new iPhone? It is sleek. It's white. It has the logo. Period. It screams 'Apple'. You have zero doubts about what brand it belongs to. Given the non-cluttered fluid nature of the design and the subtle colors, you instantly associate it with terms like 'classy', 'expensive', 'sophisticated', etc. While they say 'Don't judge a book by its cover', that's pretty much exactly what all of us do. We determine the quality of the product by the care taken into what the packaging looks like. You do not need to go all crazy and spend thousands on each package for your product. Get creative and quirky. For example, check out the packaging being done by companies like Happily Unmarried. Their boxes for individual products have some downright hilarious Hinglish (Hindi + English) description of the product inside. The use of local words like 'Dhobi Ghat' on the box appeals to the customer who might even spend enough time reading the packaging as much as enjoying the actual product inside. Plus it is a marriage between the brand identity and products. You will expect a company named Happily Unmarried to have a sense of humor, wouldn't you?

Parting Thoughts:

It has always been said that 'Any advertising is good advertising'. Need an example? Remember those annoying Trivago ads on television? Everyone hates them. But the ad does its job. You remember the brand name clearly and exactly what the company does. They have gotten the point across, and done so without hiring any professional models. If you didn't know this before, let us tell you that the guy in the ad is the India development head of the Germany based multinational company. Yep, you heard it right! So regardless of which method(s) you choose, make sure you get the name of your company out there.

More brand recall = More customers.

More customers = More Sales.

More Sales = Happy you.

Need we say more? 