

A common misconception amongst web developers is that they think they can use the same sub-domain for years and switch to a custom domain when their website gets more traffic. This is not the ideal approach towards having an online presence and the reluctance mostly stems from the fact that it needs financial investments to setup.

What are you missing without custom domain name?

- Every domain builds up something called ‘domain authority’ over a period of time. Moving to a custom domain gets your DA to zero.
- Google searches for your business get affected directly as it takes some time for Google to pass on the link juice from an old sub-domain to your new root TLD. In simpler words, you’re basically hiding your website from potential customers for some time and this could mean huge losses to the business!
- Google Analytics and Webmaster Tools accounts have to be updated to reflect your new domain name.
- A sitemap submission has to be done to all search engines again. For those not familiar with the term, a sitemap is a file where you can list the web pages of your site to tell Google and other search engines about the organization of your site content. Search engine web crawlers like Googlebot read this file to more intelligently crawl your site.
- Social media profiles would need to be updated too.
- Oh, and of course, it goes without saying that you would have to spend some time marketing your new domain name.

Benefits of Having a Custom Domain

- Yes, it’s true! Google especially prefers linking to root domains more compared to sub-domains. This means having a custom domain will increase your chances of showing up in the first few pages when someone looks you up.
- Instead of using Gmail or any other email service providers, you can have a contact email that looks something like this – ownername@yourdomain.com. Clients usually know a good business when their email looks something like that. No offence Gmail, we still love you!
- Businesses that, custom domains have known to be a lot more dependable in the eyes of users.
- Most importantly, you have a brand name from day one!
