

WHY INDIAN STORES ARE LAGGING BEHIND

Maybe there's never a product you need that can be found? Maybe it's the price tag that ruins the goods? Or maybe it's just the lack of good management and policies, but Indian stores are going through a monumental shift.

There's one side of the paradigm that's losing out to customers moving to better brands, and then there's the other side that's learnt how to adopt similar practices to win over new ones.

If we explore the lot that populates Indian cities and villages, one can find a serious lack of amenities and services that are otherwise available at the click of a button. Special discounts, cash back, rewards and a return and exchange policy keep the channels of supply and demand going on full effect.

The effects can be seen even in the remotest of regions where constant internet connections and cheaper internet data rates are opening a whole new world of opportunities for all sorts of consumers.

Local stores generally lack any services for selling goods as well where one can set prices and gain the best bargain for minimal efforts.

eBay for one, being one of the biggest names in the online shopping game, lets users sell their unwanted goods at a set price or for auction, meaning you can snap up a bargain for less.

Like Amazon, eBay is one of those sites where you find just about anything you're after. They have auction listings for individuals and stores where you can bid for products and, if you're lucky, get a great deal.

UNIQUE SELLING POINT

It's one of the market's biggest mysteries that companies have a hard time understanding- "What gap is it that we fill in the market?". The question is answered by thinking about what makes those sellers unique and what makes their pitch to their consumers unique.

Let's start with eBay. It is a trusted and secure marketplace that offers payment fraud protection for its buyers via PayPal making it one of the
