

that have promoted economies and allowed developing nations to enter the global market.

Talking from a consumer's point of view, importing has become a haven for enjoying products and services that were perhaps once far from the reaches of the average person. Feel like buying the latest smartphone straight from the assembly lines? Want to get a genuine Louis Vuitton or Prada bag without the hassle of transportation? Need an actual DSLR camera for a project that a cheap knockoff can't suffice for? All these items are just a click away thanks to programs such as Amazon Global.

Keeping the supply lines intact

Looking at importing from the opposite end of the table reveals some striking facts. Both import and export are necessary for all types of businesses and individual consumers. Individual consumers hugely benefit from locally produced products with imported components as well as other products that are imported into the country. Imported products as a whole provide better prices to a greater number of consumers.

With the expansion of the Internet, many businesses have kept supply lines intact by meeting all sorts of demands from every pocket and corner of the planet. While traditional buyers may feel disheartened by the empty aisles in local stores, they can't deny that imported goods bring in a grandeur both regarding quality and price that locals simply can't beat.

Why imported goods are here to stay

Apart from widening the prospects of purchasing to the average consumer, imported goods enjoy a lot of popularity due to some reasons. To further elaborate, importing introduces a new slew of products to a market, bringing products that inadvertently push for the creation of even smaller markets.

A good example of this has been the boom experienced by the graphics driver industry in all parts of the country to mine virtual coins; an industry that was previously restricted to gamers alone.

Another great advantage is that of a timed introduction. Using the more traditional route where local traders bring imported goods to a market may take several years, but with the internet at everyone's disposal, there's never a need to play the waiting game(except for the waiting that comes after ordering an item).