

without having a dedicated number of sellers and business websites that know how to tap into the interests of consumers.

Since manufacturing new and improved products is a never-ending process, even local businesses worldwide use the chance to import new and unique products before their competitors do. Being the first to import a fresh product can easily lead such companies in becoming a leader in a certain industry.

Looking at the opposite end again, importing has also flourished many passive incomes through drop-shipping. In a simpler perspective, it's a new way of buying for low and selling for high to customers while essentially never even having to worry about storing the product and shipping it.

Thanks to programs such as Amazon Associates, an increasing number of businessmen are now delving into a market where they advertise products online from other e-commerce websites for a lower price and on receiving an order, simply send the product to an Amazon warehouse where the company takes care of storage and shipping.

An absolute game changer as the company encourages affiliates to set up such businesses. The greater advantage with this system lies with how users can find exactly what they want as drop-shippers dabble with extreme niches to differentiate themselves from their customers. This has produced a new generation of entrepreneurs who are making stable incomes from delivering products with ultra-specific features. It's a win-win situation for both.

It's highly unlikely you'll find a Top Gear themed cap or a coffee mug from a local store and that too after spending nearly hours spanning the store aisles. But that doesn't mean that everyone prefers imported goods; some still have faith in the local corners.

Easier on the pockets

Services like Amazon's Global Store program come with a delightful bunch of features. No need to scan the internet for import duties on a product. No surprise last-minute price additions. But most importantly, you don't need international credit cards to make purchases. You can use your Indian debit or credit card, or even your netbanking account to make a payment on Amazon Global Store.

One of the major disadvantages that manual importing still has to find a solution for includes building a product return system. But for those at the edge of their keyboards, the solution exists.
