

If you buy using another third-party service provider, you can kiss goodbye to any chances of being able to return a product. Global services allow you to schedule a return pickup and even get a full refund in case the product is defective or in case the company messed up in the shipping process.

Other contenders that are adopting similar systems include Shop And Ship, Borderlinx, and ShopYourWorld. This does come at the slight disadvantage of paying upfront fees for a one-time membership which can range from $45-$50.

What these services do is that they let you get a product shipped to a virtual address. The online store delivers your order at this address, and then the service provider you've chosen will ship the product to your address.

Different shops have different criteria for charging for delivery either on the weight of the package, and which country you're shopping from, and you'll have to pay the import duty costs when the product is delivered.
