

And then arrives the problem of protecting newly established sites against a barrage of security breaches, phishing attacks and more annoyingly, service attacks.

Certain customers may face complications in procuring items bought by importing if the product violates any laws while shipping and arriving at the destined country.

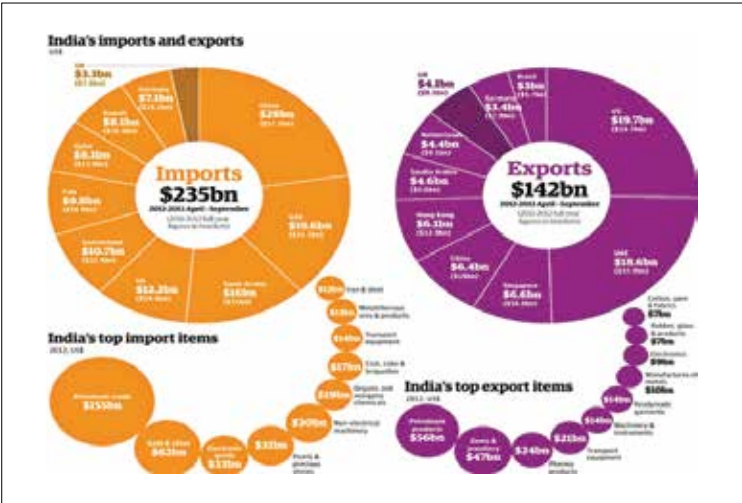

New businesses must at the same time have to invest a particular part of the expense setup and capital in advertising and building trust among people in the face of local brands and businesses.

And what about the locals? Well, they become restless. The sweeping effect with which large brands such as Target and Walmart have left smaller grocery stores out of business has been the subject of many a dozen documentaries and angry online comments.

But the resultant effect has been positive. Local and native businesses are realising the need to spanning out on a global scale and are entering the markets to satisfy customer needs in Western countries.

What the stats have to say

A recent UK survey of exporting companies revealed that companies who begin to export reported a 34 percent increase in productivity in their first year alone.
