

companies are bringing in such sentiments to technology. The show stealer this year was an innovative Haggbot that does the haggling for you at simply giving away a voice command. Flipkart, Dentsu Webchutney and Google incorporated the idea in this year's edition of The Big Billion Days that truly shows just how innovative companies are getting at keeping the counters busy.

India's happy season

In India, the celebration season offers an extraordinary open door for organisations to reconnect with the flow and forthcoming customers and clients. Traditions and conventions identified with gifting are likewise on the rise as the expanded spending limit of India's shoppers develops, prompting high deals across categories of customer interest amid the festival season.

This year, advertisers anticipate that customers will see a 10 to 20 per cent expansion in deals toward the finish of the season when contrasted with this period a year ago. The popularity is assessed predominantly in view of the craze that develops around these festival each year to snag the best deal possible along with the fears of price increases likely to surface at the year end and due to the GST forcing buyers to rethink their budget.

As these online platforms assume a vital role in urging buyers to encounter new items and brands, they present an awesome open door for upcoming brands to effectively take advantage of India's developing buyer markets and inclinations. d