

meet the demand, or so they made it seem. When HMD Global relaunched Nokia with their Android phone, they used the same strategy to create hysteria among the brand's ardent followers (it did help that Nokia still enjoys a cult-like following around the world). Products sold out in mere seconds and created such a boost for the brand that other consumer product vendors too ventured into the trend. But the impact this strategy made on the smartphone selling industry is unparalleled, especially in the lower budget segments. Apple or Google never ventured into the flash sale trend, and it simply won't be practical for them considering the higher spending power of their customers. But the trend flourished in the lower budget phones.

Now, considering all this, giving advice on whether opting to buy in a flash sale is a good idea or not is not an easy task. To get the product we want, sometimes we have to go the extra mile. Some of us might not mind doing so while some others would be frustrated at the hoax. What can be done, however, is to provide you with tips and tricks that would help you get that product every time. If you are to go the extra mile, why not go prepared?

Register on time

The first and foremost step is to register for the flash sale well in advance. Be aware of the announcements and make sure you are there when the registration begins. Most flash sales follow this pattern when launching a new product. Some products might be exclusive to a certain online retailer while some might be directly through the brand website. While this is also
