

tion or feeling. When you finally get that emotion, it doesn't matter if you need to do more editing or use another brush.

Start by split toning

Split toning is going to help you with brightening the image by adjusting the intensity of each tone. You can start by focusing on the mid-tones and ensuring that there are enough saturation and brightness in the image. Split toning will also allow you to bring out the natural colour of the subject, by adding more light to the image.

Focusing your split toning only on the subject is ideal, as you don't want the background to light up as well. This will make the image look artificially done. You should also focus on key areas within the subject where you want to change the tones. You can even turn the image black and white and start editing out the acne and blemishes there.

Before and after spot correction and brushes

Focus on spot correction

Spot correction is the next critical step in the editing process. You want to start by using the healing brush or spot healing tool. You can press 'J' on the keyboard if you're using Adobe Photoshop and start focusing on individual blemishes and acne.
