

in the image and to not tamper with the facial structure. You also need to blend in the image with the face retouching using brush tools or stamping.

Background elements are critical as well, in which case you will need to retouch the background components like trees, houses and people. You will perform careful retouching process on them as well to preserve the vintage restoration. Even something as small as the branding on a handbag will have to be carefully preserved to bring in that golden era.

A before and after of the vintage restoration process

You can cap it all off with macro-level filters. These filters can help remove dust and noise from the image to make crispier. While they affect the macro image, you can always use adjustment brushes to make changes locally. You can also focus on certain parts of the image that can remain vintage to bring in authenticity to the vintage restoration process. This helps in creating a complete picture in the vintage restoration process. d
