

significantly different mood and representation than others. You can create a winter afternoon when shadows are edited in properly.

The outline of the clouds is critical to edit as well. The sun will have its relationship with the clouds in the picture. Being cognizant of smaller details is important.

Blending and retouching

Blending is an important process in the overall transformation scenario. Blending will allow you to add unique elements effortlessly into the image and change the tone of the picture completely. This is even more so true when trying to change the image drastically. When going from summer to winter, it's important to blend in the right textures to the final image.

You can also start by blending in the forest line to the sky so that you get a crisper picture in the end. The final landscape will look neater, and the elements will have all blended in together. To become a great professional, it's important to focus on the minute details as much as it is to finish the macro piece.

Retouching is critical as well. Retouching will allow you to remove unwanted elements from the image. This includes many people in the back, rocks that are out of place and elements that don't belong in the winter side of the picture. Additionally, you can remove any giveaways that the picture has been edited.

This includes any grass textures that still hold their true identity after the editing has been performed. Removing them via retouching, stamping or cloning is a good idea as they don't belong in the final image. It's important to have a holistic look at the image to get a gut feeling about the image. If there are elements out of place, then retouching the photo can help restore that. The process works for vintage restoration as much as it does for DIY transformations. d
