

marketing teams. Twitter does great work in recommending posts and feeds based on what a person likes. Not only do they personalise commercials for the users, but they also present them with an option to turn it off as soon as they log out of Twitter. Attributing to this, the ROI on Twitter is 40% more than the other social media platforms generate. Hence, Twitter finds more investments than other platforms.

What is the audience profile on Twitter?

In order to maintain oneself in business, it is important for companies to target the right type of audience. All sorts of people use Twitter. In fact, it is one of the most popularly used social media platforms with a growth rate of 9% daily. Needless to say, people here will have a wide variety of choices. Companies target those people as the audience who show or are likely to show maximum interest in their products. Since Twitter is being used regularly by people, social media strategists find it easy to find their target group among the audience.

Audience demographics on Twitter (left) and Facebook (right)

Twitter passes on the information about who likes what to different companies that partner with them. They are also responsible for generating and recommending advertisements that are more personalised and suited to the needs of the users. Using the information of the users and the companies, Twitter has come up with a set of its own strategies to maximize the benefits for all the parties. With its features, as we will see in the following segments, it also provides its users with the discretion of choosing what they want to see and what they do not.

What is the expected ROI on Twitter?

Twitter is one of the most favourite go-to social media sites for marketing strategists. This is because of their high return on investment or ROI percentage.