

media platforms according to their business needs. A company may want to spread content through videos to its worldwide audience. In such a case, the company creates its own YouTube channel to display a wide range of videos and demos in one place and starts connecting and interacting with the viewers. If a company wants to interact with its customers and target audiences of various age groups more personally, Facebook is the most convenient platform for conversation as it provides the liberty of two-way communication with maximum interactivity. On the other hand, Instagram is a brilliant visual tool for sharing images of products. If a company wants to share the behind-the-scenes images or the creative process of their product development without including much text but visually or wants to promote events using hashtags, Instagram is the ideal tool that boosts customer involvement and participation. Alternatively, if anyone is interested to share short, concise, and time-sensitive information immediately with the followers by concentrating more on the text and rather than visuals, Twitter is the ideal platform for quick interactions with the audiences. It also allows using hashtags to connect and share the post with audiences. Then again, if anyone wants to connect career and business professionals for freelance work, customer base, and for finding jobs, then LinkedIn is the most affluent social media platform for working professionals.
